Sanying Line

New Taipei's newest railway — a driverless elevated line to Sanxia and Yingge, open six weeks and in a dated free trial, documented from the operator and government.

STATIONS 12 [1]	STRUCTURE Fully elevated [4]	AUTOMATION Driverless [1]	INTERCHANGES Dingpu (Bannan Line [/rail/metro/lines/bannan-line/]), Yingge (TRA) [1]

Taiwan opened a new railway six weeks ago and, as of this page's writing, you can still ride it for nothing: tap in with any stored-value card and the fare is zero until the end of August [\[1\]](#). The Sanying Line is New Taipei's own metro — built by the city, run by its own metro company — and it gives Sanxia [\[/rail/metro/stations/lb06/\]](/rail/metro/stations/lb06/) and Yingge [\[/rail/metro/stations/lb08/\]](/rail/metro/stations/lb08/), two districts that have watched the MRT map grow around them for thirty years, stations of their own.

What opened, exactly

The line runs 14.29 km on a fully elevated alignment through Tucheng [\[/rail/metro/stations/bl03/\]](/rail/metro/stations/bl03/), Sanxia and Yingge, with 12 stations [\[1\]](#) [\[4\]](#). Trains are driverless, two-car sets [\[3\]](#), running about every 6 minutes at peak and 8 off-peak, and the end-to-end run takes roughly half an hour [\[1\]](#).

It connects to the rest of the network at both ends of its purpose: at Dingpu, riders change to the Bannan Line [\[/rail/metro/lines/bannan-line/\]](/rail/metro/lines/bannan-line/) and the Taipei core; at Yingge, to the TRA main line [\[1\]](#). That pair of transfers is the line's argument — the districts it serves previously reached the MRT by bus or car, and the city's stated case for the line is the commuting time it removes.

Service opened on 30 June 2026, with the first train in the early afternoon and a free trial period to 31 August: any electronic stored-value card tapped in and out rides free [\[1\]](#). Trial hours began at 10:00–20:00, changed to 08:00–22:00 from 1 August, and the operator has announced 06:00–24:00 for 16–31 August [\[5\]](#) [\[6\]](#). Normal fares are planned to run from NT$20 to NT$35 by distance, but the operator says the charging start date will be announced separately; the end of the free trial is not itself a confirmed fare-start date [\[1\]](#).

The first month

The operator's engineering bureau put the first month's ridership at over 750,000 journeys^[2] — for a two-car driverless line serving two outer districts, on restricted hours, a figure that surprised the line's own planners into saying so publicly.

On 25 July the city unveiled an indigenous-themed painted train: Amis clothing patterns on the exterior, an interior built around Amis weaving culture, and character figures from the Atayal and Paiwan peoples^[2]. No published schedule says when it runs, which is presumably part of why chasing it has become a small local sport — but that last observation is this page editorialising, not a sourced claim.

What is not yet on this page

- Rolling stock detail. The trains are reported as Hitachi-built, but the accounts found so far disagree on which Hitachi plant built them, and the fleet size and speed figures circulating are single-source. A dedicated rolling stock page waits until the operator's or builder's own record can be cited. Marked TBC above rather than borrowed.
- The depot. zh.wikipedia names 三峡機廠 in Sanxia^[3]; nothing else about it is established here yet.
- Station pages and coordinates. TDX still has no Sanying station dataset. The twelve station pages already exist in the manually sourced registry, built from NTMC `[/rail/operators/ntmc/]DORTS` primary station material^{[7] [8]}. Their displayed coordinates come from the official New Taipei landmark records' published TWD97 point fields, converted to WGS84 without map geocoding^[9].
- The extension. An extension toward Bade in Taoyuan has Executive Yuan approval^[3]; its state of construction is not established here.

Why this page exists already

This site's usual pattern is depth before breadth — one line finished properly before the next is started. The Sanying Line jumps the queue for a reason: it is six weeks old, English coverage is effectively nonexistent, and the facts above are the ones that rot fastest — trial dates, hours, fares. They are cited to the operator's own announcement, snapshotted, and dated, so that when the trial ends this page can say what changed rather than quietly rewriting itself.
