
Data

Every English-language source we could find has Taipei's metro line colours wrong. Not badly wrong — most are within a few percent — but not one of the seven matches what the operators actually publish. These are the official values, taken from Taiwan's Ministry of Transportation and Communications, with the working shown.

Official line colours

All 7 lines: hex values, swatches, contrast against white and black, and which operator publishes each. Plus a reconciliation against the Wikipedia and Wikidata values — including one case where a citation to an official route map was further from correct than the value it replaced.

Station records

All 157 stations across 7 lines — codes, Chinese and English names, coordinates, interchanges and running order. Downloadable as JSON.

Bibliography

Every source cited anywhere on this site, marked primary or secondary, with the pages that rest on it and the date each URL was read. The primary-to-secondary ratio is the honest summary of how much of this site is first-hand.

Provenance

What came from official data, what is hand-researched, what is still unknown, and how current any of it is. Including the staleness caveat that applies to everything on this site.

Use it

All of this is derived from Taiwan government open data and is reproduced here under the same terms. If you are building something and need Taipei Metro line colours or station records, take them — a link back is welcome but not required.

If you find an error, it matters. The whole point of this section is that incorrect values propagate quietly for years, and the only defence is people checking.

Station names, codes and sequence from TDX Transport Data eXchange, Ministry of Transportation and Communications, operator TRTC. Government open data. Retrieved 2026-08-05; source last updated 2020-01-31. Provenance.