
Station naming and renames

Officially documented former names, appended station names and the gaps where a current label is not yet a rename record.

Station names have two different kinds of official record: a naming action, and a later page that remembers or uses a name. DORTS says that naming, renaming and appended names are meant to follow a defined procedure established in 2007.^[1]

How the formal process works

The current Taipei `[/rail/thsr/stations/taipei/]` rules are the text issued under order 府捷秘字第 10830001521號 on 17 January 2019.^[2] They assign names for stations under construction to DORTS and names for operating stations to TRTC `[/rail/operators/trtc/]`, with a standing review committee chaired by the DORTS commissioner.^[2] Candidate names are assessed for local identity, landmark prominence and historical meaning; the named feature must be within 500 metres, names are limited to six Chinese characters, and duplicate or confusingly similar names are barred.^[2]

For a proposed Taipei rename, the 2019 rules require signatures from at least 8% of eligible residents in the station's own and adjacent neighbourhoods.^[2] After review and verification, a proposal passes only if yes votes outnumber no votes and reach one quarter of all eligible voters; a failed proposal cannot be resubmitted for that station for four years.^[2] An appended name is a different instrument: it supplements an insufficiently distinct station name, is normally limited to one addition within 800 metres and six years, and does not appear on station entrances.^[2]

Former names recorded by DORTS

BL07	漢生路站	DORTS calls current 板橋站 「原名漢生路站」 ; the action date and instrument are TBC. ^[3]
------	------	---

012	大橋國小站	DORTS calls 大橋頭站 「原稱大橋國小站」 and records the later change; the action date and instrument are TBC. ^[4]
R18	天母站	DORTS describes 明德 as 「原名天母站」 ; the action date and instrument are TBC. ^[5]

These former-name records are not inferred from slash notation or from a planning code; each appears as a former-name statement on a fetched official page. ^[3] ^[4] ^[5]

Formal rename and appended name

The 9 June 2020 New Taipei gazette says LB03 站：挖子，更名為「長壽山」. ^[7] The current New Taipei DORTS route page uses LB03 長壽山. ^[8]

The same gazette says LB05 站：龍埔，加註「三峽廣行宮」; this is an appended name, not a rename of 龍埔. ^[7] The current route page preserves that distinction as LB05 龍埔（加註名稱：三峽廣行宮）. ^[8]

New Taipei later used the same type of action for LB08. Its 8 September 2025 gazette says LB08 站：加註「新北市美術館」 and identifies the legal basis as the New Taipei naming, renaming and appended-name rules. ^[9] The notice calls this an addition to the station name, so it is not presented here as a replacement for the station's primary name. ^[9]

Planning labels and current names

DORTS's Circular Line `[/rail/metro/lines/circular-line/]` planning page calls Y16 「民生新埔站」, while the current operator station list publishes Y17 as 新埔民生. ^[10] ^[11] No naming action was found for this order change, so it remains a published label conflict rather than a claimed rename.

Daqiaotou's addition is a separate history: DORTS says it was not in the original Executive Yuan-approved Xinzhuang `[/rail/metro/stations/o18/]` Line station list, but was added after local petitions and approval to use Daqiao Elementary land. ^[6]

Gaps

The gazette/order dates for the BL07, 012 and R18 former names remain TBC, as do the official instruments behind the failed leads recorded in the research report. Current station lists and engineering labels can establish what a source called a station; they cannot, by themselves, establish when a formal rename occurred. ^[1]
