Regions

This site is organised by mode — rail, bus, ferry, bike — because that is how the sources are organised. A reader going to a specific place wants the opposite cut. Each region below gathers every system, network and page that serves it, with nothing duplicated: every link goes to that page's one real address elsewhere on the site.

Taipei and New Taipei

The core network: one metro system spanning two municipalities, one joint-operation bus brand run by fourteen private companies, an aerial ropeway, a river ferry, and the system this site has researched deepest.

Taoyuan

Airport MRT and a Green Line still under construction, run by Taoyuan Metro Corporation; a bus evaluation scheme currently under public dispute over its own punctuality figures.

Taichung

A single driverless metro line, a large bus network run by fourteen named operators on the government's own portal, and six colour-coded trunk routes launched in stages from 2016.

Kaohsiung

Two metro lines plus a circular light rail line, a ferry to Cijin Island, and a bus evaluation scheme whose report archive runs back to 2011 under three different names.

Tainan

No metro or light rail yet — the network here is entirely bus, run by a shifting set of operators under the 大台南公車 brand, evaluated annually by the city government.

Hsinchu

City buses run by six companies under Hsinchu City Government, plus Hsinchu County running a separate scheme of its own — neither city nor county has rail or light rail on this site's evidence.

Chiayi and Alishan

Home to the Alishan Forest Railway, Taiwan's 762 mm mountain and forest railway climbing from Chiayi city into the mountains — a system this site treats as heritage/special rather than commuter rail.
