Bike

YouBike — the shared bicycle system that is genuinely part of the transit network, with a generational story nobody has told properly in English.

History

From the Xinyi pilot to the retirement of the first generation — the timeline, dated from primary announcements.

YouBike

Taipei's bike-share ran three fare policies and two mutually incompatible dock generations before this page's writing, and the story English coverage tells — "free rides for transferring since 2018" — turns out to be the middle third of a longer, better-documented arc.

YouBike belongs on a transit site: it shares the stored-value cards, the transfer economics and — in its dock placement — the metro's own station footprints. English coverage treats it as a tourist amenity; the actual story is an infrastructure transition, because the system's two generations are mutually incompatible and the changeover had to happen city-wide, in place, while millions of rides a month continued.

Read History for the pilot-to-present timeline; Generations for the 1.0/2.0/2.0E hardware story — where the intelligence lives, why the newer docks need no mains power, and what that freed the network to do; then browse the live Stations indexes by municipality and district.

This section is early on the build list because it is self-contained: it depends on nothing in the rail work, the data exists in the same government platform the site already uses, and the story is bounded rather than churning.
