

Regions

This site is organised by mode — rail, bus, ferry, bike — because that is how the sources are organised. A reader going to a specific place wants the opposite cut. Each region below gathers every system, network and page that serves it, with nothing duplicated: every link goes to that page's one real address elsewhere on the site.

Taipei and New Taipei

7 pages

The core network: one metro system spanning two municipalities, one joint-operation bus brand run by fourteen private companies, an aerial ropeway, a river ferry, and the system this site has researched deepest.

Taoyuan

3 pages

Airport MRT and a Green Line still under construction, run by Taoyuan Metro Corporation; a bus evaluation scheme currently under public dispute over its own punctuality figures.

Taichung

4 pages

A single driverless metro line, a large bus network run by fourteen named operators on the government's own portal, and six colour-coded trunk routes launched in stages from 2016.

Kaohsiung

5 pages

Two metro lines plus a circular light rail line, a ferry to Cijin Island, and a bus evaluation scheme whose report archive runs back to 2011 under three different names.

Tainan

2 pages

No metro or light rail yet — the network here is entirely bus, run by a shifting set of operators under the 大台南公車 brand, evaluated annually by the city government.

Hsinchu

2 pages

City buses run by six companies under Hsinchu City Government, plus Hsinchu County running a separate scheme of its own — neither city nor county has rail or light rail on this site's evidence.

Chiayi and Alishan

1 page

Home to the Alishan Forest Railway, Taiwan's 762 mm mountain and forest railway climbing from Chiayi city into the mountains — a system this site treats as heritage/special rather than commuter rail.
