

Data

Every English-language source we could find has Taiwan's metro line colours wrong. Not badly wrong — most are within a few percent — but not one of the 11 matches what the operators actually publish. These are the official values, taken from Taiwan's Ministry of Transportation and Communications, with the working shown.

Official line colours

All 11 lines: hex values, swatches, contrast against white and black, and where each one was read. Plus a reconciliation against the Wikipedia and Wikidata values — including one case where a citation to an official route map was further from correct than the value it replaced, and one line the platform does not carry at all.

Station records

All 210 stations across 10 lines — codes, Chinese and English names, coordinates where published, interchanges and running order. TDX-backed records are downloadable as JSON; Sanying's twelve records cite the operator on their station pages.

Bibliography

Every source cited anywhere on this site, marked primary or secondary, with the pages that rest on it and the date each URL was read. The primary-to-secondary ratio is the honest summary of how much of this site is first-hand.

Provenance

What came from official data, what is hand-researched, what is still unknown, and how current any of it is. Including the staleness caveat that applies to everything on this site.

Network growth

A dated station-opening timeline from the researched station records, with every missing opening date left as TBC and grouped by line for checking.

Comparisons

Lines by length and stations, operators by documented fleet-family records, and every station by structure and latest imported ridership.

Changelog

The project's run log as a reader-facing history of new research, corrections, audits and data layers, regenerated at build time.

Use it

All of this is derived from Taiwan government open data and is reproduced here under the same terms. If you are building something and need Taipei Metro line colours or station records, take them — a link back is welcome but not required.

If you find an error, it matters. The whole point of this section is that incorrect values propagate quietly for years, and the only defence is people checking.

An independent, non-commercial reference site. Not affiliated with any transit operator or government body in Taiwan. Line colours are the official values published by each operator through Taiwan MOTC's open data platform. About this site.

Station names, codes and sequence from TDX Transport Data eXchange, Ministry of Transportation and Communications, operators TRTC, NTMC, TYMC, and TMRT. Government open data. Retrieved 2026-08-24; source last updated 2016-11-23. The 12 Sanying station records absent from TDX are sourced directly to New Taipei Metro and government publications on their pages. Provenance.